THURSDAY, APRIL 29, 1888. "While magazoni is the national diet of Italy, it has become completely Americanized," said a prominent Italian restaurateur, in a recent interview. "Our American patronage is constantly increasing, which shows the growing tasts of our food. Excepting our pure, native wines, macaroni appears to be the most favored by our American epicures. In fact, all the English-speaking people in New York are taking lowingly to wholesome and allippery diet. Do you know how it is made? No! Well, I will tell you. Macaroni, vermicelli (or little worms) talliarini, &c., are the products of flour from the best quality of wheat. Macaroni differs from vermicelli only in size—the latter being made in smaller tubes. Both are prepared in the greatest prefection at Naples, and are the principal food of the great body of people there. Macaroni is to the Italian what the fig and the date are to the Inhabitants of the Levant, and what rice is to the Asiatic. The ABOUT MACARONE are to the Inhabitants of the Levant, and what rice is to the Asiatic. The hard wheat flour imported from the Black Sea is the best suited for the manufacture of macarcui. None of it ever reaches this country, except it is imported by private parties for home consumption. The flour is mixed with water, frequently washed in mountain streams, then ground in water mills, and hot water is added until it becomes dough. It is forced by pressure through a number of small holes or tubes and then cut off at the desired length. The largest tubes are called macaroni, next talliarini, and the next fedorina. Talliarini is made very much on the same plan only that it is long, narrow and flat, and when served Looks something like a wrecked spider web. Vermicelli means little worms, and when in soup one would come to that conclusion without knowing the literal meaning of the word. Spaghetti is another species of the same kind of food

It is those little things were seen in the share of stars hearts. you see in the shape of stars, hearts, crowns and letters of the alphabet;

crowns and letters of the alphabet; while eating your pudding or soup you can refresh your memory in the alphabet or study astronomy or anatomy. At Naples the preparation of macaroni and its species is best understood; nothing is used but flour and pure water, the best being made of flour of hard wheat; the most inferior, for the peasants, is made of flour of soft wheat. The macaroni used by the poor is merely boiled in water,
